England 1783-1846*, 2006, describing the apparent lack of respect for established authority that was being shown by the lower classes through events such as the Spa Field Riots and the textile workers uprising at Pentrich in Derbyshire. Source B Adapted from the autobiography of Samuel Bamford, a handloom weaver from Middleton in Lancashire, published in 1844

- 5 The suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act was a cause of anxiety to us. King's Messengers arrived; government warrants were issued and the persons they mentioned were taken to prison. It seemed as if the sun of freedom were gone down and a dark cloud of oppression had finally closed over us. Our chapel-keeper, in fear, turned the key upon us and told us we could no longer meet there. Open meetings being suspended, we held secret ones at night, but hundreds slunk home to their looms, too afraid to come to meetings.

Source C In 1817, Parliament authorised the government to spend £750 000 for the employment of the labouring poor on public works. In 1819, Liverpool's government carried through its only significant piece of social legislation, the Cotton Factory Act, which forbade the employment of children under 9 years old in cotton factories and limited the hours of work for minors aged 9–18 years old to 12 hours per day. The government also relied heavily on the likely effects on the working classes of the spread of the Church of England. In 1818, Liverpool's government persuaded Parliament to vote £1 million for building Anglican churches in the cities.
